As men's styles move fashion forward, there are more options on the market than ever before. Sifting through all the choices may not top the groom's list, so we've narrowed it down to 10 popular styles for men's wedding bands. Content Domed Ring is a classic selection of male wedding bands. The simple design fits the personal style of many men, especially those who are not familiar with wearing jewelry and do not want to sport anything colorful. They are available in almost all metals and come in a variety of widths. Advertising flat bands are another popular choice for anyone whose only gem is their wedding ring, but they are a little more modern than the classic dome style. With squared sides, the band looks sleek and modern and create a good-style companion for hipster grooms with a little more edge. Flat bands are available in a variety of metals and widths. Advertising, fortunately, is not the only style available in the ring of plain and simple men. There are a variety of popular twist patterns in classic bands. Two-tone rings are made of two different metals that work together to create different patterns. Salty waves are two of the most popular. Wheatgrain is a small bead pattern along the edge of the band, another popular pattern most commonly found in doming. Advertised just like ladies, sometimes men want a little bling in their wedding rings. Diamonds are the most popular gemstones, but sapphires, rubies and other gemstones are also readily available. Rings with stones require more attention than regular bands because stones can be easily damaged or missing. So, if your man works with his hands, you can skip the built-in ice. Advertising sterling silver is the cheapest of all metals, which is a popular choice for budget-conscious grooms. The silver itself is a very soft metal, so it is mixed with other metals and is durable. Small bits of copper are often selected for this purpose. However, sterling is still easier to get caught in potholes and nixes than other metals and requires regular polishing because it discolors easily. Advertising platinum is a silver-colored metal that is often described as white, and holds the distinction of being the most valuable of all precious metals. This is a popular choice for grooms who want a wedding band that is more durable but durable and valuable than sterling silver. In addition to the price tag, the only downside to platinum is that it is prone to scratches. out. Advertising palladium is a precious metal known as the national cousin of platinum. In the 1930s, platinum was proclaimed a strategic metal because it turned out to be useful and hard to come by our troops, making it unusable for jewelry. Palladium has been found to share many of the properties of platinum and has become a hit with jewelers, especially due to its low price tag. Advertising If your groom is a science lover, a tungsten carbide wedding band can appeal to his inner nerd. Tungsten is a very durable, scratch-resistant metal that is a boot stain. Dark gray is an interesting alternative to gold, but it weighs more than gold, which can be inconvenient for men who don't normally wear jewelry. Advertising titanium is also an unbreakable Uber lightweight metal, it's a good choice for active men who don't want to pay attention to their wedding band. Its industrial finish means it's not super shiny, appealing to some men's no-frills styles. And it's available in sufficient supply, giving it a very affordable price tag. Advertising gold has long been the most traditional choice for men's wedding bands, and as a result, offers many style options in the ring. Gold can be polished with a shiny finish on an otherwise low frill band and is a popular choice for the ring you want to engrave. It's a relatively valuable precious metal, but it's still affordable and easy to maintain even in active hands. The only potential drawback is that some skin is allergic to gold. However, most rings can only be imported in one size. The degree to which the ring can be resized depends mainly on the characteristics of the band. If it is a regular band, it is much easier for the jeweler to increase the ring size. Bands surrounded by jewelry or decorations are more sophisticated, making them more difficult to change. For a ring to grow to more than one size, the jeweler usually requires the addition of a piece of metal that matches the original band. This loosens the ring.
